U gotta ask ur self a couple questions. Like if there wasn't anything there why be in a hurry to go back? If we didn't go there purely for science and it was mostly a race that no longer exists why would we rush to go back? Russia hates us, went, and didn't say we lied, why?

Exactly, the whole space race to the moon was just the 2 super powers flexing on each other. Like why would the Soviets just accept that the U.S won when they hemorrhaged so much money into it?

The Moon was the finish lane of the race. The Soviets did a lot first but the Moon was the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow, whoever got that won the race regardless of previous firsts. After that, it's like what else can we do? And we go back to invading countries.

Illusion Transmitter Patent

In 1980, Thomas received a patent for an illusion transmitter. The device produces optical illusion images via two concave mirrors. Unlike flat mirrors, which produce images that appear to be inside, or behind the mirror, concave mirrors create images that appear to be real, or in front of the mirror itself. This technology was subsequently adopted by NASA and has since been adapted for use in surgery as well as the production of television and video screens.

Later Career

Thomas continued to work for NASA until her retirement in 1995. During that

Her invention is WAYYYY cooler than 3D movies.

It's more like the holograms you see in sci fi. You can view a 3D image WITHOUT special glasses.

NASA uses it, some hospitals too, but not movie theaters (not yet at least!)

Like so many underappreciated Black women in science, she is a GENIUS.

While claiming she invented 3D movies isn't wholly accurate, she absolutely did develop something else we use every single day now - satellite pictures of earth.

Replies to @WavyNick and @uyarakq

3D broadly is far older than Valerie Thomas. Stereoscopes were invented in 1838 & people have been trying to translate it to movies since the early 1900s. Hitchcock's Dial M for Murder was 3D. But she did invent a very cool modern update to 3D.
