I was laid off from Twitter this afternoon. I was in charge of managing badge access to Twitter offices.

Elon just called me and asked if I could come back to help them regain access to HQ as they shut off all badges and accidentally locked themselves out.

Everyone who can leave is leaving.

#RIPTwitter Kylie Robison @kyliebytes · 1h

As we're all very aware, folks on visas are stuck, so that's who makes up most of the roughly 25% (or less than 1,000....) expected to stay. The actual impact is not yet known — there have been no internal comms about what comes next. We're nearly 2 hours post deadline.

To all the people using the #RIPTwitter hashtag and whining like babies because of Elon, you don't have to announce your departure. You can leave with one click. Remember, there are plenty of other platforms available! We will all be here when you inevitably return.

This will deactivate your account

You're about to start the process of deactivating your Twitter account. Your display name, @username, and public profile will no longer be viewable on Twitter.com, Twitter for iOS, or Twitter for Android.

What else you should know

You can restore your Twitter account if it was accidentally or wrongfully deactivated for up to 30 days after deactivation.

Some account information may still be available in search engines, such as Google or Bing. Learn more

If you just want to change your @username, you don't need to deactivate your account — edit it in your settings.

To use your current @username or email address with a different Twitter account, change them before you deactivate this account.

If you want to download your Twitter data, you'll need to complete both the request and download process before deactivating your account. Note: download your data cannot be sent to deactivated accounts.
